Planned new rules would allow an Internet provider to negotiate separately with content companies and charge them for priority service.

The latest accord between Hamas and the Palestine Liberation Organization appeared more serious than past attempts, experts said, and came as hopes faded for a resolution to peace negotiations with Israel.

A promised Ukrainian military effort to reassert control in the restive east got off to a shaky start, while an international agreement reached last week frayed even further.

The Supreme Court ruled that a $3.4 million award to a biologist Richard Primack, left, has found that with rising temperatures and carbon dioxide changing seasonal timetables, many plants are flowering earlier and longer.

The advisory group objected to the portrayal of Islam in a documentary film used in an exhibit at the soon-to-open National September 11 Memorial Museum.

A poll in four states showed broad distaste for the law, but found people would rather have it improved than repealed.

The district attorney has proposed ending the prosecution of those charged with possessing small amounts of the drug.

The company reported 1.28 billion monthly users, most on mobile devices, and easily exceeded analysts' expectations for revenue and profit.

The worst thing the United States could do is push Tokyo to compromise with Beijing in the face of Chinese pressure. The United States not only supports the Japanese position over the islands but prods Japan to be more aggressive toward China.
